Excerpt from A Legend of Glencoe: And Other Poems Taken the poet's licence, and am guilty of a wilful anachronism. This was necessary to my plan. The chief design of this legend is to trace the workings of remorse in a superstitious mind, and to illustrate the misery of crime. By means of a poetical tale, I would humbly add my comment to the declaration, that the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest. The above-mentioned anecdote struck me as furnishing good materials for a purpose of this character; and, by applying it to one of the principal actors in the appalling tragedy of Glencoe, I trust the moral, which it conveys, is rather deepened than otherwise. Of course, it was absolutely necessary that I should introduce into my poem one who was employed in the massacre and I hope to be allowed the licence, yielded times without number, viz., that of narrating as happening to one what in reality happened to another, more especially as the solemn lesson of the incident in.
